Exclusive data

Only we can offer insights from our 300 petabytes of Expedia Group owned real-time global travel intent and demand data from our leading branded sites around the world.
Travel searches continue to fluctuate

We are tracking and sharing week over week percent changes in travel searches on our Expedia Group brands around the world to understand the impact of the pandemic on travel at a regional level.

We all experienced a significant decline in travel early in 2020. Over the course of 2020 we saw data and travel patterns fluctuate week by week. We saw searches increase in May and peak in early June before declining and then rising again in August.

The vaccine news in November 2020 resulted in a short peak of travel searches, however we saw an expected dip in December as cases continue to fluctuate globally.
Travelers are mostly searching 0-21 day window

What has remained consistent since May 2020 is that—aggregated globally—the 0-21 days out search window is the most dominant.

The share of the 31-60 day search window inched up in October and into November as travel shoppers looked to reunite with their families and loved ones, and to get away during the holidays, but has since leveled out.

We can expect that travelers continue to opt for shorter-term planning in 2021.
Domestic travel searches lead international ones

Globally, domestic travel searches have largely led international searches since April.

The impact of positive, early vaccine news had a pronounced impact in November, with international travel being the main beneficiary.
Travel searches vary around the world

We looked at the percentage share of domestic and international travel searches across six countries in early November as an example of how widely these can vary.

For instance, 96% of all the searches that took place for the United States were domestic. In other words, few people across the world were looking to travel into the U.S. in early November.

However, looking at Mexico and Italy, searches from travelers outside those countries—that is, international searches—dominated in early November.
Visitors are dreaming

Our user research team conducts intercept studies on Expedia.com sites around the world to understand the purpose of their visit, and the stage of the purchase journey they are in when visiting the site.

In the early days of the pandemic, many people came to change or cancel travel, which has declined steadily.

Even more prevalent—even in those early days—is that travel shoppers are largely visiting our Expedia.com sites to dream about their next trip. That took a dip in July when shopping almost caught up.

Travelers continue to come to our sites largely to dream, with shopping close behind.
